The NoHo Gateway Sign has been illuminated after being dark for 13 years

An iconic gateway sign marking the entrance to the NoHo Arts District was relit on Thursday for the first time in more than a decade.

The NoHo Gateway Sign, a large-scale public art installation that has been dark since 2013, was illuminated during an evening ceremony led by Los Angeles City Councilmember Adrin Nazarian. Community members gathered at dusk for the event, which included a countdown to the moment the sign was switched back on

“For 13 years, North Hollywood has been in the dark,” Nazarian said. “That ends now. Investment in our community matters and we want to give NoHo Arts District the spotlight it deserves.”

Created in 2009 by artist Peter Shire, the stainless steel structure stands about 60 feet tall and spans roughly 80 feet across Lankershim Boulevard. The sign features stylized imagery reflecting the entertainment industry, including cameras, costumes and set design elements that represent the neighborhood’s artistic roots. Nazarian said the relighting was part of broader efforts to invest in public spaces and support the local arts community.

The NoHo Arts District, known for its theaters, galleries and production studios, has long been a hub for performers and creatives in the San Fernando Valley.
